

Acknowledgements

Respect for a colleague's work is a sensitive measure of how good a job he or she is doing. Our experience with the Crime Detection Laboratory, Royal Canadian Mounted Police (Vancouver) and in the field with various local police detachments in British Columbia has not only been enjoyable and stimulating, but has consistently shown the involved personnel to be men and women of goodwill working conscientiously at a socially relevant task. We wish to acknowledge the help and experiences afforded us by our involvement with these individuals. Specifically, the following 'crime lab' members have provided material and moral support for our work: Detective Inspector 'Sid' Sadowsky, Inspector Shel Payton, and section members Rick Sumner, Earl Hall, Stefano Mazzega, Julie Graham, Ron Schiefke, Doug Bateman and Nancy Ziegler. We appreciate their patience and forbearance in our continuing, and at times perhaps fumbling, foray into the rigorous methods of forensic investigation. Similarly, we wish to thank the Department of Archaeology, Simon Fraser University, for providing space, equipment, and materials for our identification service through which we hope to build a bridge between the university and the community-based police investigative agencies. In this regard, Sgt. Brian Strongman, Identification Officer with the Coquitlam R.C.M.P., deserves our special gratitude.

The authors wish to express their gratitude to Fran West for her insistence on quality in all things, to Laura Perley, Cathy Driver, and Kjerstin Smith for the cartoons and illustrations and finally to Mike Hoskins for the photographs.

"He who would separate an ego from the universe to make a name for himself must learn that the very definition of individuality is limitation; the form of a thing is described by its edge, and the edge of being is death."

[From W.I. Thompson (1981) The Time Falling Bodies Take To Light St. Martin's Press, New York, p. 200.]